Presentations

Those presentations given on the night can be viewed by clicking on the speaker's name below.

Speaker 1 - Tom Morton Arc RIAS RIBA, Director, Arc Architects Ltd

Arc Architects have prepared a report for the Vivarium Trust Co-Housing: Future Homes for Older Scots. With the opportunity to consider these issues at the Intergenerational and Co-living Short Life Working Group who will meet over the next few months, Tom will set out how intergenerational/ Co-housing solutions offer many benefits and has a unique potential to address many of these gaps but requires leadership from government, and sustained support from local decision-makers in order to flourish in Scotland. With reference to best practice in Denmark and pilot project in Fife, he will outline what Co-housing could be like in Scotland and the key steps to achieve this change.

Speaker 2 - Rick McCluggage, Architect and Director, Smith Scott Mullan Associates

New Homes for Older People - What the Future Should Look Like, will reference exemplar and award-winning projects, Rick will outline some of the challenges faced and opportunities given when designing neighbourhoods and homes for older people and include some key steps and recommendations.

Speaker 3 - Steve Malone, Principal Architect, Architecture and Design Scotland

As a follow up to his presentation - Town Centre Living: A caring Place - to the Scottish Parliament Cross Party Group on Towns and Town Centres in 2018, Steve will provide an update on the results of the work Architecture and Design Scotland have been exploring on the benefits and barriers to town centre living. As part of a three-year programme we've been focusing on the idea of a 'Caring Place'. Using 'care' as a way of looking at town centres and exploring opportunities for bringing together care and placemaking to tackle the challenges of the ageing population.

Kuan Loh, Senior Architect, Planning & Architecture at the Scottish Government

Following the announcement of the Programme for Government in September, Scottish Government's Housing Beyond 2021 Team has been working towards preparing the route map for achieving the vision for housing to 2040. Kuan will reference some of the developing themes and ideas that will inform the context to housing beyond 2021.

"It was very clear at the event that there is a lot of interest on the subject of housing and its role in the making of successful, sustainable places for communities. My recommendation is for everyone in the Group and in their own network to continue the discussions / debates and engage with Scottish Government during this very interesting time of looking forward to the next 20 years of housing and places in Scotland.

We have to explore the questions of what kinds of housing will we be building; where do we build them; how do we build; as well as the question of how do we re-use our existing housing / buildings / town centres etc so we can all help making homes that meet people's needs and better places for the future.

The ongoing Housing Beyond 2021 programme and the forthcoming NPF4 / SPP review are critical consultations with which to engage as they have the potential to shape how we will deliver housing differently, with more choice and flexibility.”

Discussion

The Housing Beyond 2021 programme and the forthcoming NPF4 / SPP review are critical consultations that can inform the Scottish Government's 2040 Vision for Housing Programme. The meeting generated considerable interest and engaged debate on how to shape the delivery of homes differently, with more choice and flexibility.

The meeting heard from professionals who highlighted where we are falling short in providing homes that can facilitate more intergenerational communities and provided examples of new approaches and innovative design solutions.

We have to start thinking about housing people at different parts of their lives. This means defining what kind of homes we should be building; where we build them; and how we deliver them are important considerations.

There is a need to urgently reflect on how we can adapt and improve our existing homes/buildings, town/village centres to help combat challenges of isolation (physical and cultural), affordability, certainty and adaptability of homes faced by existing communities with the aim of creating more caring and intergenerational places.

1. Recognising the role of public interest development as a solution. Supporting pathfinder co-housing projects could be used to test innovative community led models of older peoples housing.
2. Provide choices that meet the needs of a range of people. Help to facilitate moving and adapting homes by accessing rolling funds.
3. Working across boundaries to ensure that the private sector support delivery too and look at a range of home options that are more adaptable and flexible. Think differently by considering the provision of homes for older people or people with specific needs alongside the need for affordable homes.
4. The cost of not getting it right should mean that it is in the public interest to continue to research innovative solutions and models for homes.
